- Radoje;* A root growing under the scrub of the same name, quite common but less so in the summer months. During the cooler months the extract is also more easily extracted, as the root is crushed to a paste or cut and squeezed for the sap, the juice of which if applied to wounds will cure most infections.
- Cellane;* From the plant of the same name, found often near Radoje, a short scraggly plant appearing almost as scrub, but has broad leaves. A decongestant made by boiling the leaf slowly down into a powder and inhaling the dry substance. The plant is an evergreen and has remarkable strength against the cold both as a plant and as a powder often driving off the effects of pneumonia.
- Irit:* A rare berry growing only in summer, spring and autumn months, dying out in the cold. Poisonous to eat, the green berry is mashed into a salve which when applied acts as a local anesthetic for approximately one quintar.
